Professor Mahan, of West Point, has he following remarks on Grant's Virinia Campaign, in a letter to the New York Evening Post:

Grant's Virginia Campaign.

Gen. Grant's most vulnerable point as a General, so far as I have been able to gather from his opponents, is his campaign in Virginia. First, in taking the overland line of operations; and second, in his mode of warfare. On the first point, opinion might well have been divided had the question have no new town. Is complete, consisting in all the approved varieties, and our general stock includes all goods usually kept in a store of this kind. Headquare tess for the Delicacies of the Delicacies of the Delicacies of the Season! and had cost the country an enormous ioss in life and treasure. Whether this was due to him, or to the Government, the fact of the failure was not so very reassuring, howevergood the reasons for doing so, as to lead the Government to repeat the experiment. Grant, on his part, found himself suddenly called from his successful field of labors in the West to take command of an army which, from whatever causes, had failed—and, in too many cases, miserably failed—in all its aggressive movements. He fortunately found the army in good discipline, well-appointed, with compethem sulveringts efficers in command, ments in the Pennsylvania campaign. His enemy was in front of him, within striking distance; the country had become impatient at the fruitlessness even of its successes, and demanded vigorous action, at whatever risk or east of life and treasure; moreover, the authorities at Washington were not yet prepared to

All of these fully justify, in my opin-ion, the determination that he came to; and, considering the very mixed anture of all military problems, even when not complicated by political considerations, Puff and Powder Boxes, Cologues, Toilet Socies, I do not doubt that such will be the stauch'ss judgment passed upon this event by impartial military criticism. The movement once initiated in that coolness and pertinacity; and here comes in the field of more post ive eriticism-those unfavorable to him denying both his strategetical and tactical combinations in his subsequent move-· ment. Considering the country to be gone over, there were but two courses open to Grant-either to reach Richmond by masking and turning, in succession, the many strong defensible positions afforded by nature to Lee, or to attack Lee wherever he found him, and if he failed in drawing him from his positions, and
